79	12230	DU_J19_BA_ MMC_Q79	Read the passage carefully and answer the questions below: Pradip wouldn't elaborate on his ailments, even though I pressed him for details, wondering how he managed to do the hard labour of a tongsman if he suffered from back pain. Like most workers, and like most members of India's underclass, he seemed to operate at a high level of abstraction when it came to certain things, especially those that had to do with the body. Just as Dibyajoti had said that his mother died of 'fever' and Pradip's young room-mate had been afraid of the effects of 'dust', Pradip would only say that he suffered from 'pain'. In elite circles in India, this is a sign of the illiteracy of the lower classes, an indication of how they lack intellectual property as well as material property. But as I heard these simple words – 'fever', 'dust', 'pain' – taking the place of any complicated diagnosis or description of symptoms, it struck me that one of the characteristics of being higher up on the class ladder was the specificity with which a person could speak of one's ailments. But there was another way of understanding the use of such simple words. The workers didn't have access to the kind of medical care that would let them receive complex formulations of their illness. So they suffered with a stoicism that was ingrained in their social status. Given the lives that migrant workers lived, someone like Pradip had no choice but to abandon the nuances of illness for a broad, catch-all word. The same was true when it came to telling the story of his life, which was often empty of descriptive detail and rendered in thick strokes. (Siddharta Deb, The Beautiful and the Damned: Life in the New India . 2011) By "operate at a high level of abstraction" the author means	18917:to be non-specific , 18918:to be unconscious , 18919:to be very particular , 18920:to worry too much ,

Like most workers, and like most members of India's underclass, he seemed to operate at a high level of abstraction when it came to certain things, especially those that had to do with the body. Just as Dibyajoti had said that his mother died of 'fever' and Pradip's young room-mate had been afraid of the effects of 'dust', Pradip would only say that he suffered from 'pain'. In elite circles in India, this is a sign of the illiteracy of the lower classes, an indication of how they lack intellectual property as well as material property. But as I heard these simple words – 'fever', 'dust', 'pain' – taking the place of any complicated diagnosis or description of	18925:Social status , 18926:Literacy as intellectual property ,

			symptoms, it struck me that one of the characteristics of being higher up on the class ladder was the specificity with which a person could speak of one's ailments. But there was another way of understanding the use of such simple words. The workers didn't have access to the kind of medical care that would let them receive complex formulations of their illness. So they suffered with a stoicism that was ingrained in their social status. Given the lives that migrant workers lived, someone like Pradip had no choice but to abandon the nuances of illness for a broad, catch-all word. The same was true when it came to telling the story of his life, which was often empty of descriptive detail and rendered in thick strokes. (Siddhartha Deb, The Beautiful and the Damned: Life in the New India . 2011) The "specificity with which a person could speak of one's ailments" is indicative of:	18927:Access to medical care , 18928:All of the above ,
